

About JSPN

The basic principles of our society are: 1) to contribute to the development of psychiatry with ethical considerations; 2) to contribute to qualitative improvements in mental health, psychiatric care, and welfare services while respecting patients' human rights; and 3) to facilitate mutual learning and inspection among its members.

For the development of psychiatry, our society, through the tireless efforts of its members, has advanced psychiatric research, including registry studies and established relevant ethical guidelines; to facilitate mutual learning and inspection among members, we have established a system to certify specialists, internationalized our society, enhanced its Japanese and English journals, and implemented guideline projects.

Meanwhile, as for qualitative improvements in mental health, psychiatric care, and welfare services, many issues still remain to be addressed, though active discussions have taken place. There are no easy resolutions, but it is important to demonstrate that we are determined to tackle them and how concretely we approach them.

In this respect, we should also actively advance mental health initiatives based on partnerships with patients and their families in psychiatric care, such as improving the quality of psychiatric care, promoting mental health, and preventing diseases, as well as disseminate information, messages and recommendations.

Additionally, we will take initiatives on epidemiological studies, including mental health-related status surveys, recognition of subspecialty within the specialist certification system, compilation of psychiatry textbooks that serve as a pool of items for the specialist certification examination, promotion of awareness-raising activities for guideline projects, enhancement of our journals, and encouragement of participation for female and young members.

Recognizing the numerous issues that exist in psychiatry and psychiatric care, I pledge to make progress toward solutions on our principles.
